INTRODUCTION

St. Michael and All Angels Church was built in Norman times and has been extended and adapted over the years. Its spire is a landmark in the centre of the older part of Mitcheldean.

The churchyard is enclosed by walls constructed of local stone, the east wall fronting the High Street being lower and topped with iron railings.

Access is available via the main gate in the south east corner of the churchyard from which a footpath leads to the main south door of the church and on to link with a footpath which connects gates in the north and south boundary walls. The paths are well used pedestrian thoroughfares.

The paths also divide the churchyard into plots, which for the convenience of recording the memorial inscriptions (M.Is.) are designated as plot A, B, C, D, and E.

Within the plots the graves are laid out in regular rows that are numbered 1, 2, 3, etc.; row 1 is at the east end of the plot and subsequent rows proceed in a westerly direction. Within the rows the graves are numbered 1, 2, 3, etc.; grave 1 is at the south end of the row. Thus, when facing the memorials, they are read from left to right in the row. Graves are referenced by plot, row, and position in the row, and so grave 1 in row 1 of plot A appears in the recordings as A-1-1. See also the general arrangement plan opposite.

The exception to the east to west layout of rows are rows 17 and 18 of plot A. These rows consist of memorials which appear to have been relocated to clear space for new burials and have been conserved in rows against the north and south walls, respectively. Row 16 of plot A is also of conserved memorials. It should also be noted that the placement of the memorials in the rows in plot B is slightly less regular than is found in the rest of the churchyard; and plot E on the shaded, and often cold and damp, north side of the church is sparsely populated with memorials.

Given the years that the churchyard has been in use, there is a wide range of memorial designs to be found: a few old table tombs, the traditional large Victorian headstones, elaborate sculptural memorials, stone ledgers, kerbs (popular in the mid 20th century), to the present day modest polished granite headstones on plinths with inset vases, and tablet cremation memorials.

Plot F comprises the recordings of memorials made by Ralph Bigland in the late 18th century. These are included for completeness although many of the memorials he recorded are now lost.

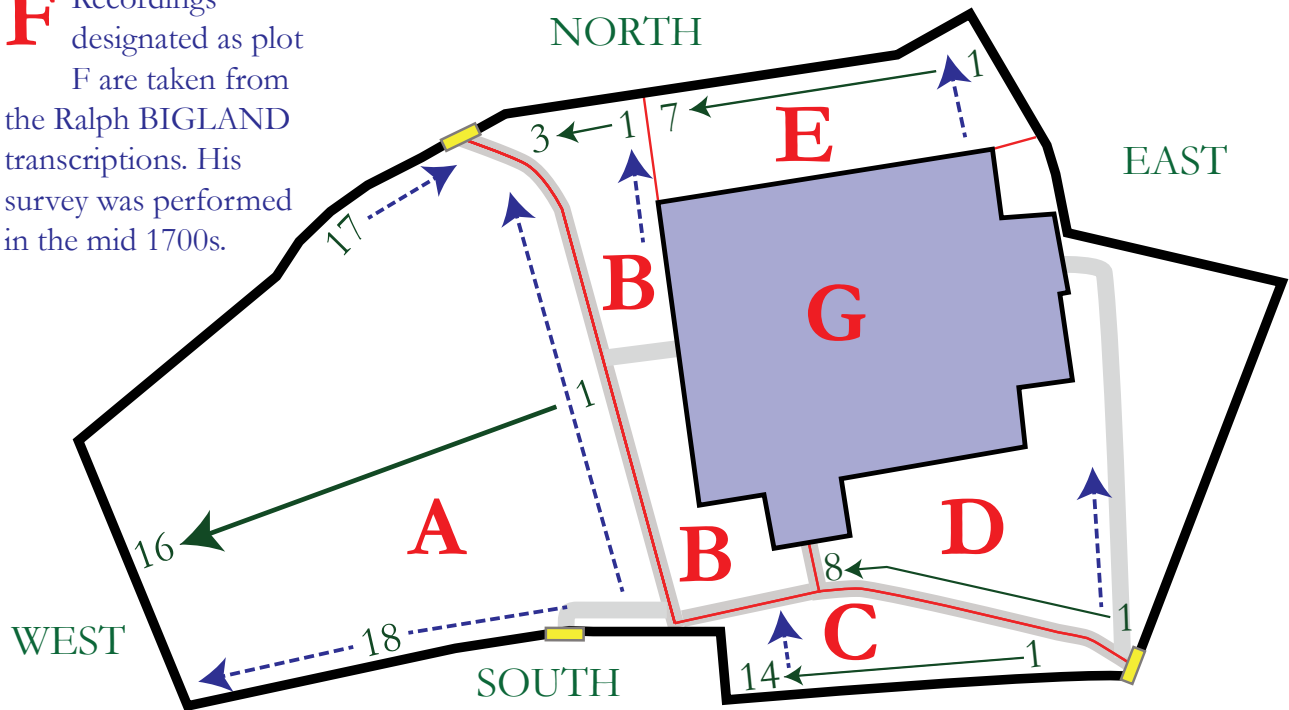

Memorials within the church are designated as plot G. Memorials in the porch are recorded first followed by those within the church commencing with those on the west wall and proceeding in a clockwise direction: north, east, and south walls. In keeping with the modern church ethos the pews have been removed from part of the nave to make space for the various pastoral events now held, and in this connection the north east corner has been partitioned off to form a kitchen area, this restricts access to the memorials in that area. There are several noteworthy memorials, in particular the striking reredos group of biblical figures sculpted by William George Storr-Barber, and the stained glass east window.

CHURCHYARD PLAN

St Michael and All Angels, Mitcheldean

F Recordings designated as plot F are taken from the Ralph BIGLAND transcriptions. His survey was performed in the mid 1700s.

Numbering:

The grave numbers are read left to right looking at the faces of the row of memorials, in general this would be south to north, number one at the south end of the row, as indicated by the blue arrow. Exceptions are Plot A rows 17 and 18 which are read left to right.

The graves are referenced by plot, row, and position in the row e.g. A/1/1 is in plot A, row 1, position 1 etc.

G Memorials inside the church are designated as plot G for convenience of recording.
